

Outer Harbor

Editor—V. J. Millicich advocates building a breakwater a mile out in the ocean to create an outer harbor. The idea is probably good. I dare say there is not much hope that those in power will see the light.

However, San Francisco can be of good cheer, for it will happen some day. First, the ocean level will rise, probably as much as 75 to 100 feet, then will rapidly recede from 100 to 200 feet, leaving the bay practically empty of water and creating a much larger harbor than the present bay. Nature will probably not do this for us overnight, however, but over a period of several millenniums, and I think we should provide for the growing metropolis right now.

OLE J. SNEIDE.

San Francisco.