

Eden

Editor The Chronicle—Sir: Have read in your paper about claims of Professor Fujisawa that the human race originated in or near Japan, etc. If the professor includes in his "Nippon mainland" the recently acquired Carolines, Philippines and Dutch East Indies, he will be entirely correct as to the place of origin of first genus homo sapiens, for the planting of that form of humanity occurred at a point lying between the Dutch East Indies and the Caroline islands. It might be the northeastern portion of the East Indies or the southwestern portion of the Carolines. Exact point not known to me. The planting of this genus homo sapiens occurred something like 19,000,000 years ago. Hindus called the land Jambodvipa (appleland). In other ages the portion of that vast holopacific continent of Jambodvipa where the first Adam and Eve were planted came to be known as Mu (motherland), and some late geologists have called it Lemuria, but I doubt whether the geological Lemuria extended far enough northeasterly to include the first paradise, Lemuria being more in the Indian ocean region. The holy mountain of that original paradise was Sumera, but since then Sumeras were named all over the planet.

OLE J. SNEIDE