

MAN STILL HAS PLENTY OF THINGS TO LEARN

Editor The Chronicle—Sir: I have been reading the Safety Valve for a long time, and get more "kick" out of it than the rest of the paper, especially out of the various opinions pro and con, people have in regard to things mortal man can know nothing positively about. Cosmic substance is manifest in such an infinite complexity of ways, visible and invisible, and the range of mortal man's five senses is entirely too limited to enable even the most learned human to argue intelligently as to the truth or falsity of any doctrine that goes beyond the range of the visible-physical. And yet they will haggle indefinitely.

He who thinks he knows most, knows least of all. An ancient saying is that the first sign of the beginning of wisdom in a man is that he "knows that he knows nothing." The great knowers among us usually do not state their knowledge of things unknowable to man, as they know the futility of trying to convince anyone whose senses do not respond to higher states of cosmic substance. OLE J. SNEIDE.

San Francisco, April 21, 1928.